women who were single usually behaved differently than women who were married with children. For instance, a woman married with kids is 28% less financially confident than a single woman without kids¹. What's more, men married with kids have more than double the financial confidence than their female counterparts¹.

The persistent gender gap in financial literacy may be the result of women feeling less confident in their financial knowledge. There is ample evidence that women are less confident than men, in particular in situations related to finance (see, e.g., Beyer, 1990; Barber and Odean, 2001). Some studies indicate that while men appear to be over-confident, women seem under-confident (see Dahlbom et al., 2011).
