In The Talking Greeks, Heath traces the relationship between speech and identity in the ancient Greek world. Specifically, he argues that speech is the central axis of Greek conceptions of self-definition. Speech, according to Heath, provided the basis for the fundamental opposition between human and animal, while control of speech was the central criterion in the Greek categorization of the human Other: women, children, slaves, and non-Greeks.

The Talking Greeks: Speech, Animals, and the Other in

First, the Greeks believed that the most important difference between themselves and other animals was that humans were capable of speech and animals were not. They thus considered speech to be a defining characteristic of humanity. The dichotomy of the talking man and the speechless animal was established early on and persisted in Greek thought of all periods.
